As technology advances, the law enforcement strategies concomitantly evolve. Recently, the use of body cameras are gaining popularity among law enforcement departments across the nation. Further, new legislation regulating body camera usage has been enacted. My research reviews the effects of the newly enacted Illinois Law Enforcement Officer-Worn Body Camera Act (50 ILCS 706) (Police Community Relations Improvement Act) in light of privacy concerns highlighted by media coverage. Officer-worn body cameras document aspects of officer activity including accurately documenting visual events, and affording greater accountability and transparency between the police and community. Along with these positive advancements, camera usage has raised other concerns. Privacy, witness intimidation, Freedom of Information Act disclosures (FOIA) and bodily integrity issues are now generated when private conversations and encounters between police officers and citizens are recorded. My research explores both the guidelines and limitations surrounding officer- worn body cameras and exposes some of the risks inherent in the legislation as it now stands.
