Students today are worried about how they will afford to live outside of college. Tuition fees are high, jobs are scarce, and the cost of living grows every day. Most college age students are thousands of dollars in debt, and those who are not have to work through college to get by. After dividing time between working, studying, and socializing, planning for retirement does not seem like a pressing issue for most students. So far in our college career, we have only taken one class that has highlighted the routes an individual can take to reach their retirement level. Based on my own personal experience, I can imagine most students are clueless about what they can do to ensure they will be comfortable once they finish working. The purpose of this research is to determine exactly how aware most students are of their retirement options and how they can plan for it. A survey examining their knowledge of retirement will be administered online. The data will be analyzed and grouped based on the results. A few concepts being investigated are the knowledge of pension plans, Roth and traditional IRAs, investments, and savings accounts. Our results should help us better understand whether students need more time reviewing retirement options.
