This presentation will demonstrate best practice in reading. Reading Comprehension will be the primary focus. There are many different ways to approach reading in the classroom. The most common one is to use reading comprehension strategies. Strategies can be done by individual students or students in a group setting and there are six different types of strategies that can be used in reading. Teachers start the year by maintaining control of the classroom reading and as the year progresses teachers are to release the control to the students once students master the strategies. Students need to be taught on how to identify parts of text and be able to link the story together in a map format. They also need to be taught the difference between fictional text and informational text and how to deconstruct both texts for greater understanding. Teachers need to use many different genres when teaching comprehension so students can see they can apply to the strategies to many different texts. Finally, teachers should preview all books before using them in the classroom or in class libraries, so only high quality and appropriate literature is being read. Our research gives many examples of problems teachers could come across when teaching comprehension strategies and ways to overcome the problem in an effective manner. Overall, there are many comprehension strategies that can be used in the classroom to teach reading effectively.
